PREFACE.

The task of compiling this Volume of the Siamese Cat Register has been considerably lightened by the existence of the previous Volumes so ably completed by Major Woodiwiss and also by those Siamese owners who responded to my appeal for information as to their registered cats. To all of these I tender my grateful thanks. I apologise for any shortcomings in Vol. IV, but, apart from the information received from owners, I have had only the notices in "Fur and Feather" to guide me. In addition, there are in this Volume particulars of over 950 cats. From this last fact, and from the rapidly increasing membership of the Siamese Cat Club, it is obvious that the popularity of the breed is greater than ever before. The present-day Siamese is a tribute to the care which has been expended in the past on the compilation of the Standard of Points.

I have to thank Mrs. Wade and Mrs. Hindley for their most interesting and helpful articles, which add to the value of this Volume. My thanks are also due to those members who very kindly provided the blocks for the illustrations, and my wife, who has helped me read proofs.

THE ORIGIN OF THE CAT AND ITS EARLY HISTORY.

The origin of the cat is wrapped in mystery, although historians tell us that it came into existence about the same time as the horse. Moncrief relates a curious legend concerning the origin, which was told him by Mulla, a minister of the Musselman religion. "For the first few days of residence in the Ark, each animal, frightened by the motion and strange surroundings, remained with its kind. The ape was the first to tire of this restricted life and made advances to a young lioness, and it was from this 'amour' that the first pair of cats sprang."

In Sanskrit writings over 2,000 years old, we find reference to the cat, and there we find the legend that the Huntress Diana, who is also the Moon and identical with the Goddess Bast, of the Egyptians, took the feline form when the gods fled from the giants. In this shape she was able to assist her friends by acting as a spy.

Our domestic cat probably came to us from the East, and is a descendant of old Egypt, which country, being the granary of the ancient world, may well have been the first to consider the advantage of taming such an animal. It is mentioned in inscriptions in Egypt as early as 1684 B.C., and was certainly domesticated thirteen hundred years before Christ. The earliest known representation of a cat as a pet is at Leyden in a tablet of the Eighteenth or Nineteenth Dynasty, where we see it sitting under a chair.

Animal worship was probably introduced into Egypt by Chorges, the second king of the Second Dynasty, and the cat appears to have held first place in their worship and was a venerated inmate of their temples. The Goddess Pasht, or Bubastes—the Goddess of Cats—was represented under the Roman Empire as having a cat's head. In the time of Thothmes IV—1500 B.C.—a temple at Beni-Hassan was dedicated to her. Behind this temple the sacred cats were buried, and many cat mummies have been found there, as well as at Thebes, Speos and Artemides, but most people seem to have preferred to have their pets embalmed and sent for burial to Beni-Hassan. According to Herodotus, this was the finest temple in all Egypt. It is thought that our common word, Puss, is a debased form of the word Pasht.

The Etruscans and the inhabitants of Taranto, in South Italy, were the first Europeans to make use of the cat. It was imported from Egypt and was kept not only as a rare and petted favourite, but as a destroyer of mice. There are signs that it was introduced into Greece about the same time, again from Egypt.

The story of Pangur Bán was written in the eighth century by an exiled Irish student who sat over his books in the distant monastery of Corinthia and wrote upon the margin of his copy of St. Paul's Epistles the poem to his cat which is so charmingly translated by Robin Flower in the Poem Book of the Gael.

The word cat is said to be derived from the Latin word "cattus," through cattare=to see, and was thus named because it could see in the dark.

We always speak of a female cat as a "queen." This is almost certainly the debased form of the Saxon word "wheen," which was used to signify the female sex.

In the time of Hoel the Good, King of Wales, who died A.D. 948, strict laws were made for the preservation of animals, and cats were included as being of great value on account of their scarcity and utility.

I have spent days in the library of the British Museum, trying to throw some light on the origin of the Siamese cat, but with no success. The skull and body structure are very like the cat mummies of Egypt. In Cleopatra's time we know that there was an extensive trade between Egypt and the Far East, and surely it is possible that cats were sent out in the grain ships to protect them from rats. Darwin says, in "Variations of Animals and Plants," Vol. I, "It is certain that cats cross readily with various wild species, and it would appear that the character of the domestic breeds has, at least in some cases, been thus affected." Probably this fact, together with climatic and geographical conditions, have evolved our Siamese cat. In "Mysteries of Religion and Magic," Oldfield Howey says: "For 200 years Siamese cats were only to be found in that portion of the Royal City of Bangkok where the Monarch and his Court resided. But though we can trace the variety for so long a period, its origin remains obscure. The Hon. Russell Gordon, who made a study of the subject, considers it is derived from a cross between the Sacred Cat of Burmah and the Annamite cats that were introduced into the religiously sealed and guarded Burmese and Cambodian Empire of Khmer when this succumbed to the attacks of the Siamese and Annamites in the seventeenth century."

Probably a certain number of these Sacred Cats got out and crossed with the native cat, for, to again quote Darwin ("Variations of Animals and Plants," Vol. I), "Throughout an immense area, namely, the Malayan Archipelago, Siam, Pegu and Burmah, all the cats have truncated tails, about half the proper length, often with a sort of knot at the end." And it is this Malayan strain we want to breed out when we disapprove of a kink in the tail of our Siamese.

What we do know quite positively is that our love of cats was shared with us by many of the famous people of all ages, from the Egyptians down to present times. One must be intelligent to appreciate cats. Petrarch loved his cat almost as much as he loved Laura, and when it died he had it embalmed. Tasso addressed a sonnet to his female cat. Mohomet had a favourite cat called Muezza, and a story is told how once, when he was sitting concocting his system, his cat curled up and went to sleep on his sleeve. Rather than disturb Muezza, he cut off his sleeve, when he wanted to get up. St. Gregory the Great is said to have loved cats. Beatrice d'Este, Duchess of Milan, 1496, wrote to her sister Isabella, wife of the Marchesa Francesco, Lord of Mantua: "And you, delightful sister, how fare you? And has your breed of cats with long hair succeeded well? If you have a male kitten with tawny hair and blue eyes, I pray you to send him with the young negress you have promised me. I will give you in exchange my little biche's next litter." Cardinal Wolsey had his cat by him when acting in a judicial capacity. Cardinal Richelieu owned and loved many cats, and Sir Isaac Newton was so fond of cats that he is said to have had two holes cut in his door—a large one for the cat, and a small one for the kitten—so that they might come and go at their own sweet will!

The Management of the Stud Cat.

When starting stud work, the most suitable form of housing is the first thing to decide. The building must be fairly lofty and airy, with at least one or more windows, and a large run, part of which should be covered in for bad weather. The size of this must be determined according to whether your cat is to have his liberty at certain times or not.

If your stud cat can be brought up by you from a kitten, so much the better; he will then become thoroughly used to your handling and to your voice before the start of his career. All cats should be handled very quietly but firmly, and it is the greatest mistake ever to chase a Siamese when you wish to catch him, as nothing tends to make him more wild. It is a mistaken idea that Siamese are fierce, but they are temperamental and never forget a fright or an injury. Gain their confidence, and all will be well, but if they once lose confidence in you, you will probably be able to do nothing with them. They are also very susceptible to change of voice (perhaps because they talk so much themselves!); for this reason, much can be done to train them by inflections of the voice.

As in all breeds of cats and with other animals, too, the stud cat must of necessity be larger and have more bone than the female, and it is quite wrong to think that a weedy, lightly built kitten denotes type. Some of the largest animals are the best proportioned and breed the finest type. The female Siamese being rather a small animal, your male must be big enough to sire stock with bone and stamina, but beware of coarseness.

There is a difference of opinion as to whether a visiting queen should be kept in the stud's house. Personally, I think it is most necessary to have a second pen, so that the queen may be shut up near the stud till she gets used to him. Very often she will have nothing to do with him for two or three days after arrival, and it is only by watching her attitude towards him that we can determine when it is the right moment to let them out together. It is useless to hurry the matings. Watch your visiting queens, as often the best-tempered ladies are spiteful at these times and may damage the stud unless he knows his job well enough to get out of her way; and a sweet-tempered young male may be made nervous, or may even be put off for weeks, unless the stud owner controls the queen and prevents her flying at him. When the queen arrives, it is very necessary to have a room for inspection before putting her with your cat. Train your stud to jump up on to a shelf or into his pen after mating the queen; you can then shut him up while the queen has a roll and quietens down; it is far easier to handle your own stud cat than somebody else's queen after mating!

Opinions also vary as to the age at which a cat should be started at stud, but certainly he should not be put at public stud before twelve months old, and then only to receive occasional queens; later, once a week, and his second season, and after, two queens a week is sufficient.

Care must be taken over the stud cat's food, as he will need more nourishment to guard against loss of condition during the mating season. Grooming and handling are also important items of the daily routine, and absolute cleanliness in the house and pens is, of course, essential.

Do not treat him as a mere stock-getting machine; give him as much liberty as possible, but where this is not possible, give him more personal attention and petting. A Siamese asks for human companionship and affection, a stud cat just as much as a pet house cat, and if he does not get it, he will pine; if he does get it, he will repay you every time.

"MEAT" AND "FISH" IN A PACKET!

Cats are better in coat, healthier and vastly more companionable if an excess of meat is avoided and a properly proportioned diet arranged. To exercise the right care in feeding them has never been easier than now. SPRATT'S Special Cat Food includes meat, fish and pure Cod-Liver-Oil, but far from being troublesome to handle or obtain—as is the case with fish, lights, liver and so on—it is a clean, dry preparation in a neat, handy packet, and will keep indefinitely. Cats love it, so do kittens.
